Wide-ranging as Annihilating Difference is, it could have been supplemented by a chapter on the thorny concept of “cultural genocide”—policies that aim to destroy a culture, rather than the biological structure of a people—especially in view of the anthropological focus on culture and indigenous peoples. The chapters on trauma in post-genocidal situations need to highlight more the encounter between psychoanalysis and anthropology.

READINGS | The Ethnography of Political Violence

This chapter takes a look at how anthropologists can provide an analysis of the devastation that follows genocide and how survivors try to rebuild their lives. The analysis presented in this chapter focuses on a hamlet in central Cambodia, where nearly half of the population studied in 1959–60 died of disease, overwork, starvation, or execution.
